The true object of school is not meremerely to fill the minds of pupils with y to teach what is found in text books, see. and the comfort and happiness of society. Most persons have eyes and yet have never learned to use them in reading the great book of nature that is ever one; before us, filled with the history of the ages beneath our feet, and with the beauty, grandeur and glory of God anough and an above us—beauties too effect with light and truth to be delineated with human pen. Ears have they, but they have never been attuned to the must hall be his home, the inviting learned to appreciate the nelody of the signing breeze or the roar of the old coean which sing, the one of God's gentleness and the other of his greatness and grandeur. For them the songs of birds have no entrancing power, and the rippling brooklet sings not of parity and love, it fails to lift them out of self up
